Description:

The course offers a comprehensive overview of digital life, that is, of the way in which digital devices, online services and multi-channel, always-on media permeate the everyday for many people around the globe. Rather than being a uniform affair, digital life is a multi-faceted construction. Media are essential but they permeate social conduct, domestic interaction, and professional contexts in very different ways. In order to discuss and understand the complexities and contingencies of media life, we'll take a look at how digital media has an impact on the social constitution or our lives. Then, we will be able to turn to a set of fields in which media become a core resource and have a systemic impact. Moreover, digital life is constituted not only by information and communication technology. Therefore, in order to better grasp how people live in, with, and through digital media we also have to take a look at issues of power, class, place, and time and the way, media have helped to reshuffle these aspects.
